Standing Up When Life Falls Down Around You

Elizabeth B. Brown

Revell
a division of Baker Publishing Group
Grand Rapids, Michigan
To my BELOVED

Our cherished children
Kim, Paul III, LeeAnne, and Brad

And our grandchildren
Lauren, Ashley, Paul IV, Michael, Kaylee, and Mara Kathryn

When I sit on the porch talking to God about my life, I am going to thank Him for you.
Contents

Acknowledgments  11
Prologue  13

1. Standing Up  15
   What happens to you is not as important as your response to it.

2. Facing Your Giant  24
   If you do not believe you can win, you will lose your battle!

   "It's not the size of the dog in the fight that is as important as the size of the fight in the dog." —Dwight Eisenhower

4. When Pain Is a Good Thing  40
   Warning: life without pain could really hurt you.

5. Redirecting Your Thoughts and Your Emotions  53
   Control the direction of your thoughts and you control the direction of your life.

Elizabeth B. Brown, Standing Up When Life Falls Down Around You
Revell Books, a division of Baker Publishing Group, © 2016. Used by permission.
(Unpublished manuscript—copyright protected Baker Publishing Group)
Contents

6. Handling the Bully 63
   Stewing may soften meat but it hardens the heart.

7. The Elephant in the Room 73
   The only mistake you ever truly make is the mistake you never learn from.

8. When Problems Stack 84
   “Character cannot be developed in ease and quiet. Only through experience of trial and suffering can the soul be strengthened, ambition inspired, and success achieved.”
   —Helen Keller

9. The Stories You Believe 95
   You cannot change the past, but you can change the story that you tell yourself of the past.

10. Coping with the Pop-Ups 105
    You can’t stop thoughts, but you can refuse to let them play in the attic of your mind.

11. Where Faith and Life Meet 114
    His eye is on the sparrow and I know He watches me.

12. The Help beyond Understanding 123
    “My religion consists of a humble admiration of the illimitable superior spirit who reveals himself in the slight details we are able to perceive with our frail and feeble mind.”
    —Albert Einstein

13. Letting It Go 131
    When you forgive, you in no way change the past—but you do change the future.

14. Dealing with Family and Friends 139
    The shortest distance between two points is the route you travel in the company of a friend.
Contents

15. Seek Your Purpose  149
   “The two greatest days of your life are the day you are born and the day you find out why.” —Mark Twain

16. When You Want to Help  159
   “The best way to cheer yourself is to try to cheer somebody else up.” —Mark Twain

17. The Forgotten Children  171
   “It is easier to build strong children than repair broken men.” —Frederick Douglass

18. You Will Get Through This  184
   “If there is meaning in life at all, then there must be meaning in suffering.” —Viktor E. Frankl

Questions for Discussion  191

Appendices
   A. Amy’s Letter  200
   B. Scripture for Help in Difficult Times  204
   C. Quick Reference Anchors  207

Notes  209

Bibliography  212
Acknowledgments

So many deserve my gratitude for being our family’s guide and support along our journey through heartache to joy. How could we have survived whole, as a family unit, and filled with joy if it had not been for you? The journey would have been so much more daunting without your sensitive, open, generous, and profound care. You held our hands, hugged, listened, and were wise with your counsel.

A special thank-you for those who read through this manuscript and offered wise advice—my husband Paul, my son Brad, my siblings Richard Bowie and Amy Williams, my granddaughter Lauren DeGennaro, and my friends Jeff Anderson, Cindy DeVane, and Karen Randall. My son Paul III saved me many times as I struggled in war with my computer. (It had a mind of its own!)

There were many who shared their stories, including Sandy Cox, Tina Thomas, Boyce Berry, John Holbrook, Michael DeGennaro, June Barrett, and Suzy Williams. The Brown Fellowship of 120 gifted me with their wisdom and tweaked critical points through discussions and study. There were also a host who simply offered...
Acknowledgments

encouragement and unknowingly imparted wisdom. Thank you for your part in this book.

There is no way for our family to express enough gratitude to those who have been our guides and support as we traveled through travail. Our family—close, extended, and friends broadly spread—each of you has made a significant difference in our lives. The best and most wonderful things of life cannot be seen or even touched. They are felt by the heart. Thank you!
I write this book with aching sadness yet also with sure knowledge that doing so is a blessing. I want to share how we found our way to joy after a loss that knocked us to the ground, because someone, somewhere, doesn’t feel he or she can. I am happy to tell you of the gift of faith and the blessing of caring family and friends. But, more than anything, I want to arm you with the tools that make recovery and recalibration possible. There are choices to be made in difficult times that will fill you with gratitude for life or allow you to sink further into despair.

Life has its incredible days; it also has days when it is hard to stop the flow of tears. Just keep pressing forward. A deep peace and an abiding joy can fill your spirit even in such times. Hold tight to the idiom that every day may not be good but there is something good in every day. See yourself as on a venture to find ways to overcome the hurt, not forget the past. There are ways to live with whatever has happened without hopelessness.

You may feel the world is over, just like a caterpillar locked in its cocoon. Cocoons are dark and frightening. Breaking free takes time and effort. The good news is that as a caterpillar breaks free it becomes a butterfly. It transforms from crawling in the muck to flying in the sky. So can you! I know such metamorphosis is possible.

We are programmed to work best by following the instructions of the designer. The body rights itself, the emotions balance, and with each problem overcome we become stronger and more able. Be aware that you are in a war. Battles to prevail over emotions that beg you to wallow, wail, long, and rage are hard fought. Giving up is easier—but it is not better.

This book is not filled with religious clichés or pious laws. It is about trusting God as you wonder why. It is about making critical choices to live victoriously instead of merely surviving. Joy comes as you choose gratitude when instead you want to despair; you must find good in the present to break the chains that bind you to the past.

Wisdom embeds. Your walk and faith become simple. You trust God’s care even as you understand your choices, not a magic eraser, will wash away the anguish. Come with me as we discuss the anchors and lifelines that steady your rocking boat in life’s storms.

Hang in there, friend. You are on a journey that has the power to make your life rich and deepen your appreciation for the moment. Everyone wants happiness; nobody wants pain. But you can’t find the rainbows without the rain. I pray you may find hope and appreciation for your journey in Standing Up When Life Falls Down Around You.

Joy is a choice. It can be your choice. The more you sing in the rain, the less disheartening the storm.

Come. Let us share together. Time is too precious to be squandered on anguish.
Standing Up

What happens to you is not as important as your response to it.

ANCHOR: I learn what to expect and grab the lifelines that are anchors in the storm.

Hello, friend. I am sitting here this morning with you on my mind, wishing I could wave a wand and help you put your life back together. I’m trying to do the same with mine. Sadly, you know as well as I do that nothing can magically erase loss, injustice, unfairness, hurt, and guilt. Life must be processed, in and out, for the heart to fill with hope. This process requires intentional effort to let go of the past to find joy in the present. This is a tall order when it seems easier to give up than to stand up.

I don’t know your specifics. That isn’t necessary. But I do know you picked up this book because you or someone you care about is in pain; life has fallen down around you. The fallout feels heavier than you can lift and bigger than you are; your emotions are chaotic and out of control. You are knocked to the ground and recovery seems impossible. You simply aren’t sure you can get back up. Where is the hope?

This book may help! At the very least it may arm you for future challenges, but I suspect you may be trying to navigate through a crisis now. Like me, you are probably not coping with a pull-yourself-up-by-your-bootstraps problem. This is an it’s-all-over, it’s-not-going-to-change, it’s-ended issue or, perhaps worse, you have to live with the ongoing problem. Recovery seems daunting. Do you have the strength?

Who could understand what you feel? Who could describe the shock when you were hit out of the blue, believing all was well and then—wham! Perhaps you saw the inevitable demolition about to happen. Who would appreciate your dauntless efforts to prevent the calamity? What if, most devastating of all, you recognized the crisis gathering and prayed fervently that the collapse or injustice would not happen? Yet it did!

What do you do when what has happened cannot be reversed; when health is irreparable; when a mistake, decision, or action cannot be revoked? I’ve been there. Like you, I wondered why and wished I could turn back the clock. But now I am facing another catastrophe and this time I am armed. I first learned to travel through the rodeo of grief and its gruesome emotions by grabbing lifelines to pull myself from the devastating cocoon of longing for my daughter LeeAnne. She died from a viral encephalitis one week before her seventh birthday.

Anguish after Lee’s death consumed my joy for six years. That was twenty years ago. I trusted that her death was within a greater life design, but I longed for her presence. It’s not that I didn’t face reality. It was not that I didn’t trust God’s care for our child. It was simply that time did not erase the pain of longing. During that period I spoke in conferences with thousands of families in grief, physicians, and caregivers who sought ways to recover from their personal tsunami or help others do so. I returned from each session in deeper despair as I shouldered their burden as well.
Standing Up

We all journey through many challenges in life. Most we handle with grace or resign ourselves to the reality after much mumbling and whining. But the truly devastating crises of life can encapsulate us for a lifetime unless we choose to let go of what is no more. Through helping so many with their struggles, I saw played out in real lives the anchors that help some stand, while others merely wrapped themselves in victimhood, even those with deep faith.

It was in writing The Joy Choice that I realized the length of time I rummaged in grief was a choice—my choice. I determined to choose joy. I chose to see what I had, not what was gone. I grabbed the lifelines shared in Scripture and played out in the lives of those who remained unbroken in spite of personal disaster. That doesn’t mean I quit missing my daughter, especially when memories would cavort. Instead, I learned to turn missing LeeAnne into times I relished the memories. I know you are seeking the same.

Truly, knowing what to expect and how to survive deep hurt is a gift, for life is quiet only in moments. There are critical choices necessary in the midst of the horrid times in life. We must be wise, because while some choices make our situation better, others make regaining balance and finding hope more difficult.

Life doesn’t remain quiet for long. We began another epic journey when Kim, our first child, began a valiant three-year struggle with leukemia in 2010. I refused to believe she would die. This was merely another life challenge. Kim had four children; she would certainly fight and win her battle with the disease. And she did fight—but she lost. She died on my birthday (more than sad!) and we were again thrown into a devastating tsunami. I knew I could choose to rail against the loss or be grateful for the time I had shared my precious daughter Kim’s life. I assure you the anguish

Elizabeth B. Brown, Standing Up When Life Falls Down Around You
Revell Books, a division of Baker Publishing Group, © 2016. Used by permission.
(Unpublished manuscript—copyright protected Baker Publishing Group)
wanted to consume our beings, but as a family we chose to turn away the negative to dwell instead on the gift of her time in our lives.

Losses, injustice, and unfairness are part of life. We pray we never suffer a wound we can’t survive. Regardless of how impossible it seems that you will survive this one, be assured you probably will, as most do physically. However, I believe you want more than merely to survive. You want to look forward to your day. You want to pursue the promised abundant life. That may seem a stretch when your mind is so connected to the past. Yet surviving while remaining focused on your losses, injustice, or unfairness is like allowing your anguish to live rent free in your head.

Perhaps surprisingly, men have a more difficult time than women during the first two years of recovery after a catastrophe. Their statistics of longevity and health plummet: four times more suicide, three times more accidents, six times more strokes, and ten times more heart attacks. Also, 40 percent seek refuge in drugs. Women fare better, at least at first, but their statistics plummet in the third year and follow much the same pattern as that of men.¹

Why? Perhaps because from the start women let out their feelings, sharing their anguish with friends, family, and even the grocery checkout clerk. Men tend to stuff it, suck it up, and wrap themselves in armor. How can they talk it out when the classic question to a man is “How is your wife/mother/girlfriend?” Or, when on a more personal level, if he is asked “How are you?” his typical reply is “Fine” or “It’s tough.”

My husband, Paul, and I, like you, have confronted plenty of hurdles as we traveled life together. But each storm we handled fueled our confidence that we could weather the next. We dealt with the financial issues of a young married couple in graduate school, marriage challenges when there was only time for learning and little for loving, baby responsibilities, career shifts and moves, and then a child with chronic health problems. Most would agree that watching a child hurt is far more arduous than handling one’s own pain. It certainly was for us.

We agonized for our two-year-old LeeAnne when her diabetes was declared brittle, which simply meant she hosted a multitude of complications. Still, thanks to God, she blossomed. She was a charming beacon of light. We were wrapped around her like ants on sugar. But then she was gone. I understand why many marriages crumble after a child’s death. Death would have been easier than survival as a united family. It was two years before tears were not a constant companion and six years before memories brought laughter.

I was fortunate. A dear friend, Suzy Williams, offered wise counsel after LeeAnne’s death. She assured me there were common elements in any disappointment or loss and she asked me to remember that, regardless of what we felt or what was expressed:

- everyone was hurting.
- no one was going crazy.
- each of us would process our pain differently.
- what each of us needed for comfort would be different.

As my emotions screamed and my thoughts seemed haywire, her words resonated. These feelings are normal. Knowing what I might experience was critically helpful. Recognizing differences in the ways each of us coped freed me from feeling my way of coping was also the best for others in my family. My hope is that this book will be as helpful for you as her words were to me.

Hurts bring anguish that gnaws on one’s spirit, relationships, and happiness. My soul grew tired from longing for LeeAnne. It became apparent that there were only two choices: grow bitter and wither, hanging on to the hurts and injustice, or survive and thrive, thanking God for the gifts of life, both the good and the bad. I surrendered. I couldn’t do it on my own, leaving God’s guidance in the background. I needed a pathway to joy.

Faith offers no panacea, no quick fix for life’s challenges, yet Scripture is the Designer’s guide for what works and what doesn’t work when life’s problems cause joy’s demise. The Bible is filled with stories of real people. Some valiantly overcame their problems while others wore the robe of victimhood. People today are no different. We all know those who bemoan their difficulties as if they are a badge of sainthood while others glow with an inner peace despite their problems.

I clung to Jesus’s words: “I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full.” I wanted that! I wasn’t searching for pie-in-the-sky in the afterlife. I needed help in the here-and-now. Perhaps you do too. Faith offers hope, but be assured it is also in the line of fire. You question, If God cares, does He care about me? and Though He is able, is He able to help me?

No matter the cause of our distress, our pathway back to joy requires the same things: a choice to be grateful for what was and a decision to appreciate what is. Of course, we cannot be grateful we were abused, our marriage ended, or our child dropped out of school. It is impossible to be happy for our war with disease or injury. Time doesn’t make the hurt from the chaos of such tragedy go away. The gut-wrenchingly difficult decision to focus on the gifts of what was and the positive lessons learned through the struggle assuages our pain as it strengthens our character. Character is forged in times of challenge just as a photograph is developed in darkness.

At first I bumbled through grief’s course. It was only when I shifted to focus on how blessed we were to have shared LeeAnne’s life for seven years that light began to shine in my darkness. I built in little trigger thoughts—lifelines—that helped me turn away the negatives. I studied what was normal and to be anticipated. I chose to see what I had, not focus on what was no more. I chose to live with joy, even with a hole in my heart. I found anchors to steady my tilting boat.
Standing Up

When Kim died, we plainly hurt just as much as we did during LeeAnne’s struggle for health and subsequent death, but I am handling “me” with much more wisdom. We as a family are committed to clutching the threads of recovery. I know if you are reading this book you are also seeking a path away from your anguish to a sense of joy. Recovery requires both time and choice to grasp the lifelines that anchor us in a harbor of calm.

Friend, there is good news: you are searching for help. You want to learn the steps to break the strangleholds that bind you in unquenchable longing or anger. That says a lot about your courage and tenacity. It takes a lot of strength to determine to work through the thoughts that want you to give up and hang on to the unchangeable. You are seeking a guide to move forward, even as you fear that very act will dishonor someone so precious to your life, let a culprit off the hook, or force you to recognize the situation is irreversible. You want to understand your programming, what to expect, and how to cope with what cannot be changed. You want justice, not revenge. You seek to find purpose, the something good that comes from overcoming bad.

In Standing Up When Life Falls Down Around You, I’ll deal with the internal storms caused by loss, injustice, and wrongs, as well as the innate power each of us has to find happiness in our midst. We will address the issues for which all of us seek insight.

- How is it possible to be happy again?
- How can I move forward when the hurt is so great?
- How do I alleviate anger or guilt that is so powerful?

Recovery requires both time and choice to ease the hurts of life.
• How do I calm chaotic emotions when there might not be a happily-ever-after solution?
• How do I trust God when I am struggling with doubt?

Many people do not make it out of the zone, a football term that implies a tunnel of chaos, characterized by pain. Former certainties struggle with confusion. Fear of what comes next reigns. Such times are a zone of pain. But just as in the game of football, you can break free and make it to your goal line.

There is no question—happiness is an easier choice for someone splashing in puddles than for someone drowning in a swamp. Fortunately, there is wisdom that can guide you through the choices necessary to pull you from any waters, no matter their depth. I have intentionally addressed some of these concepts several times. Some are too critical to recovery to overlook. Hopefully, repeating these lifelines will highlight their importance.

If you are muddling with an issue addressed in a chapter, read the chapter several times. Highlight a phrase that addresses your need. Write out a plan to address the issue. Underline an anchor. Hold tight to the lifelines to recovery. Handling a crisis in life requires courage, determination, and intention. I hope you are coping rather than muddling as you deal with your tsunami.

Be warned: all tough times put you at a crossroad where you choose either to be responsible for thoughts and decisions that incite your emotions or to join the ranks of those who drape themselves in black. One path leads you toward an abiding sense of joy, even with the challenge of great hurts. The other path holds tight to the past and its anguish, guaranteeing a lifetime of pain not only for yourself but also for those who care about the wounded. You may have taken some vicious hits. A good share of us have serious pain—health issues, divorce, addiction, wretched children, a despondent spouse, or low self-esteem. Guilt. Loneliness. You may have started with good intentions but became blindsided along the way. Still, it is true that all in life lasts for but a season. As you know the sun will rise, so also believe that this period of hurt will end. It was always so. It will always be. Recognize that just as seasons change, you, too, are in a process of change.

Recovering after a stunning blow begins with your own desire for a life that is not just lived on the surface but is rich and deep and high and wide. Come, let’s journey together so that you will change for the better, not the bitter.

LIFELINES

1. Life doesn’t stay quiet long.
2. Abundant life is for now, not just the afterlife.
3. Faith offers no panacea, no quick fix, just a guidebook of choices for what works and what doesn’t.
4. It is choice, not just time, that eases the hurts of life.
5. Happiness is an easier choice for someone splashing in puddles than for someone drowning in a swamp.